The first of these is the fact that the number of species of plants and animals which are found in a given area is usually proportional to the area of that area.
 This is known as the species-area relationship.
 It has been found that the number of species
 increases at a constant rate with the area.
 This relationship has been used to estimate
 which are likely to be found in a given area.
 It has also been used to estimate the number of species which are likely to be lost if a given area is destroyed.
 The species-area
 relationship is one of the most important principles in ecology.
 It is a principle which has been found to hold true for a wide variety of organisms and in a wide variety of areas.
 It is a principle which has been used to explain many of the patterns of biodiversity which we observe in the natural world.
